Presentation

The word “dream” is not univocal: It can indicate a mental state, a neurophysiological process, a future project, a private desire, a pathetic illusion, among other meanings. Such a polyvalence of the name implies a polyvalence of the concept: when saying “dream”, one can mean the brain process that instantiates during sleep, the contents of such a process, the mental state of imagination, the imagined content, and so on. To reduce this polyvalence to an ambiguity, “dream” can mean both the mental process and its contents. Thus, one can distinguish between dream as act and dream as act-content. According to this perspective, one can claim that a univocal view is not enough to approach a multifaceted phenomenon. Though the neurobiological description of the dream process remains the unavoidable basis for any rigorous investigation on dreaming, such a description does not encompass a few other aspects that can be taken into account in dealing with the dream state. Basing itself on the aforementioned considerations, the conference will propose an interdisciplinary discussion on dreaming that will focus on the diverse perspectives able to provide a comprehensive understanding of what it is like to dream. Hence, medical and neurophysiological explanations of the dream experience will be accompanied by and compared with analyses coming from the research fields of psychology, psychotherapy, cognitive science, philosophy, and art. In this way, the conference aims at offering a variegated reading of the most common and mysterious phenomenon of mental life.
